

P.S. The following remark should really not have been necessary, especially to an Askon like yourself.

By way of illustration of how matters of public interest are handled in this country on federal, state and local levels. Thus, every state has a Governor and every city has a Mayor, and there is also a President at the head of the whole country. Now, if there is a problem of how the financial affairs of some municipal department should be conducted, the authority to whom one would have to turn is not the Governor of the state, and certainly not the President of the U.S.A., but to the local Mayor and city administration.

From the above, it is understandable that the procedure should be similar in regard to a Chabad House and the like.
