

P. S. With regard to your writing about the undesirable influence of certain persons in regard to the religious attitude in your home - you should the following:

(1) Have some friends speak to the party in question (again and again, if necessary) that it is not right to interfere (especially in such a matter) with the life of a married couple or do anything that might disturb their mutual relationship. This is particularly true in the present day and age, when a deep religious faith is an "anchor" that preserves inner harmony, and gives one the strength to resist trials and pitfalls (including those in the economic area).

(2) Move to an apartment out of proximity to the said party.

(3) Avoid lengthy debates with the said party, which in most cases arouse the desire to come out triumphant, rather than to establish the truth. It is much better (and this is, of course, an essential thing to do in any case) to find friends who would endeavor to enlighten the said party and bring them close to Torah and Mitzvoth, etc.
