Primary Benefits

- + Provide the internal benefits of Copaiba's β -caryophyllene in convenient, easy-to-swallow softgels
- + May help support cardiovascular, immune, and digestive systems due to the chemical component β -caryophyllene*

Description

Copaiba resin has been used orally for centuries in traditional wellness practices to support the cardiovascular, immune, digestive, and nervous systems. β -caryophyllene, a primary chemical constituent of CPTG® Copaiba, aids digestive discomfort and protects the digestive system.* Emerging research also suggests that the β -caryophyllene in Copaiba may aid in the protection of cells and support healthy function of the body's cardiovascular, immune, and nervous systems.* Copaiba Softgels are easy to swallow, made with tapioca, and provide a convenient way to receive the internal benefits of Copaiba essential oil.

Concept

Copaiba contains the highest levels of β -caryophyllene (BCP) among currently known essential oils. An irregular cannabinoid and sesquiterpene, BCP is a potent constituent within Copaiba essential oil. BCP selectively binds to CB₂ receptors in the endocannabinoid system (ECS)—a signaling and regulating system comprised of enzymes, receptor sites throughout the body, and endocannabinoids produced by the body. With cannabinoid receptors found widely in the body and all major organs, the ECS acts as a major regulator of human health. The CB₂ receptors in this system are of particular importance because they are primarily found within the immune system. Research seems to indicate when Copaiba is consumed, the BCP binds to these receptors and aids healthy immune and inflammatory responses.* It also appears to influence multiple signaling pathways to promote healthy liver, digestive, kidney, heart, and brain function.* With its wide influence on key organs, BCP supports general well-being.
