THE PAINTING

Strickland made no particular impression on the people who came in contact with him. To them he was no more than a man in constant need of cash, remarkable only for the fact that he painted pictures which seemed ridiculous to them; and it was not until he had been dead for some years that the dealers from Paris and Berlin came to look for any pictures which might still remain on the island where he created his best works. They remembered that they could have cheaply bought canvases which were now worth large sums, and they could not forgive themselves for the opportunity which had escaped them.

There was a trader called Cohen, who had once come by one of Strickland's pictures. He was a little old Frenchman, half trader and half seaman. I went to see him and began to talk to him about Strickland. He had known Strickland well. "You see, I wasn't interested in him because he was a painter," he told me. "We hardly get any painters in the islands, and I was sorry for him. I gave him his first job shortly after we'd met. I had a plantation, and I wanted a supervisor. You never get any good work from workers unless you have a man over them. So I allowed him plenty of time for painting, and he could earn a bit of money. I knew he was starving so I offered him good wages."

"I can't imagine that he was a very satisfactory supervisor," I said, smiling.

"You got that right! He only remained a few months. When he had enough money to buy paints and canvases he left me. But I continued to see him once in a while. He would turn up and stay for a few days; he'd get money out of someone and then disappear again. It was on one of these startling visits that he asked for the loan of two hundred francs to settle his debts. He looked as if he hadn't had a meal for a week, and I didn't have the heart to refuse him. Of course, I never thought I would see my money again. Well, a year later he came to see me, and he brought a picture. He did not mention the money he owed me, but delivered a picture that he'd painted for me."

"What was it like?" I asked.

"Do not ask me. I could not make head or tail of it. So I took it into the attic and put it away with all sorts of rubbish. Then, after thirty years, my brother wrote to me from Paris interrogating whether I knew anything about an English painter who used to live in Tahiti. It turned out that his pictures fetched large prices, and my brother thought there was money to be made. So, my wife and I went up to the attic, and there, among piles of rubbish was the picture we never hung in our house. I looked at it again and so did my wife. We didn't see anything in the picture. My wife even thought that my brother must have gone crazy if he wanted that thing. It depicted a plantation of coconuts with blue leaves, something never and nowhere seen before. Well, we sent it to my brother. When I received a letter from him, I couldn't believe my eyes. What do you think he said? He confessed that he thought it was a joke that I had played on him. He would not have given the cost of postage for the picture. Imagine his surprise when the trader stated it was a masterpiece, and offered him thirty thousand francs. He would have paid more, but frankly my brother was so taken aback that he'd lost his head. He accepted the offer before he was able to collect himself."

WEARABLE TECH DEVICES

The approximately 15 million smart glasses, fitness bands and watches sold proves that public interest in wearable technology has rocketed recently. 8.1. ____ Just like PCs and smartphones, wearable devices create a ‘data exhaust’, a stream of quite easily accessible information that is extremely attractive to cybercriminals.

One of the most apparently innocent forms of wearable technology is the smart fitness band, which measures a range of activities: from steps walked to hours slept. 8.2. ____ Having acquired such data, they are able to work out where the target of their attack lives, works, and stops for coffee. The hacker could then use this information. Data extracted from a smartwatch can show chronic high blood pressure which could be used to prove that a person is unfit for work. A cybercriminal could use such information to blackmail their targets, or even to publicly discredit them. 8.3. ____ If a cybercriminal snapped images from it, they could build up a complex picture of where the target is, what they are doing and who they are meeting. The wearable devices could also act as gateways to other devices or data stored in the cloud. If the smartwatch or eyewear is unprotected, it becomes the weak point in the chain, giving hackers a backdoor to confidential data.

Unfortunately, many cybersecurity experts acknowledge that there is very little consumers can do to protect themselves from these risks. 8.4. ____ However, it should not be up to users, but to the wearable technology manufacturers themselves to install security into their devices.

adapted from www.telegraph.co.uk

- A. For most of us such detailed information on other people’s lives seems irrelevant. However, it might prove invaluable for hackers and cybercriminals.
- B. One of the precautions they can take is to choose strong passwords or turn their fitness trackers on at the end of the street or round the corner, not outside their front door.
- C. But experts are warning that such an explosive growth in the demand for these gadgets could soon lead to a security nightmare.
- D. In some cases wearable technology gadgets may improve consumer security by being used, for example, as authentication devices which enable recognition.
- E. Another threat to the users of some devices is the built-in camera which may contain a lot of personally sensitive information.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF SPACE FOOD

As the first space flights lasted just a few minutes, there was no 9.1. _____ to carry food onboard. But in the early 1960s, the astronauts of Project Mercury stayed in space for longer periods and had to eat something. The first space foods were unappetizing, to say the least. Most were semi-liquids that were squeezed from tubes and sucked up through straws.

By the time the Gemini mission was launched in 1965, the food 9.2. _____ a bit more enjoyable. The meals were freeze-dried, meaning that they were cooked, quickly frozen and then put in a vacuum chamber to remove the water. 9.3. _____ rehydrate the food, the astronauts simply injected water into the package with a water gun.

The Apollo astronauts were the first 9.4. _____ utensils and no longer had to squeeze food into their mouths. The mission introduced the spoon bowl, a plastic container with dehydrated food inside. When the water was injected into the bowl, the wetness of the food made it cling to the spoon instead of floating away. The Skylab mission, launched in 1973, had the 9.5. _____ of onboard refrigeration, which allowed them to carry 72 different types of menu items.

After the launch of the first space shuttle in the 1980s, meals began to 9.6. _____ the ones that astronauts ate on Earth. They had the choice of 74 different foods and 20 drinks and prepared their meals with a water dispenser and an oven.
