STRANGE PLACES TO LIVE IN

A. AL HAJJARAH, YEMEN

Al Hajjarah was built on top of a massive rock. Even the local inhabitants are not sure when the first people arrived here, but this incredible walled town is said to date back to the 12th century. The houses themselves are fortified as if always ready for enemy attack. Thanks to the town's seclusion, the centuries-old traditions have survived and are still cherished there. The lands surrounding the town are relatively fertile, and the area receives sufficient rain to grow plants and support typical Arabian livestock such as goats, camels and horses.

B. GUADIX, SPAIN

Travellers who stray off the beaten track will be rewarded in this town by the sight of 'cave houses' constructed in the shadow of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The labyrinth of more than 2,000 cave homes is thought to have been created around the 16th century, when Moors, fearing persecution from their enemies, fled to the hills and carved their houses in the soft sandstone. Today, the caves are often well-appointed, with marble floors, running water, electricity, and even the Internet. Amid the dry desert landscape, the caves with whitewashed chimneys and doors provide a welcome relief from the fierce heat during the summer months.

C. LAKE TITICACA, PERU

The Uros people built 42 islands on Lake Titicaca on the border of Peru and Bolivia as a place to live. This happened around the 13th century, when attacks from their aggressive Inca neighbours became particularly frequent. The Uros formed the islands from bundles of floating reeds whose dense root systems act as natural support. On each island they constructed a number of dwellings. The islands could be moved – like large rafts – to evade approaching enemies. A few hundred Uros still live on the islands. Many of them work in tourism, which provides welcome financial opportunities, but at the same time it has led to the old traditions falling into disuse.

AMAZING NATURE

There's increasing evidence to show that trees talk to one another, protect one another and even organise themselves into communities.

Scientists have proved that trees communicate danger by using chemical signals. For example, some acacia species on the African savannah defend themselves against giraffes by pumping toxins into the leaves. The giraffes get the message and move on. 5.1. ____ The giraffes have learned that when one tree tastes bad, others in the vicinity will, too. This is because when the acacias come under attack, they give off a warning gas that signals a crisis situation to the immediately adjacent trees. That triggers other acacias to dump toxins into their own leaves as a defensive measure.

Pines use a different tactic. When an insect bites on a leaf, electrical signals travel from the damaged area to the roots, which produce a bitter substance that begins to flow back to the leaf. 5.2. ____ For example, pines attract wasps that lay their eggs on the back of caterpillars which are eating their leaves, in this way condemning the caterpillars to death.

Another fascinating discovery is that trees seem to help their neighbours in times of need. 5.3. ____ Sometimes they can even pick out their close relatives. Some become so tightly connected at the roots that they die together, like a devoted married couple. Other individuals, diseased or hungry, can be identified and nourished until they recover. When thick silver-grey beeches behave like this, they bring to mind elephants. 5.4. ____ Many rot and disappear within a couple of hundred years — which is not very long for a tree. It appears to be the closeness of connection, or even affection, that determines how helpful the other trees will be.

adapted from www.dailymail.co.uk

- A. Like the herd, trees look after their own, helping the sick and the weak back to health. Of course, this does not work for every tree whose life is threatened.
- B. Interestingly, this support is not random. They distinguish members of their own species from among others surrounding them.
- C. If the roots find themselves in trouble, this information is broadcast throughout the tree and the leaves start to release off-putting compounds.
- D. But in addition to this, something even more amazing happens: the tree identifies the attacker by its saliva. After that, it releases pheromones which encourage specific predators to prey on the attacker.
- E. However, instead of going right to the next tree, they wander at least 100 yards before trying their luck again. Why do they go that far?

Tekst 1.

A COMPETENT MECHANIC

The car swept across the narrow bridge and round the corner beyond it. Geoffrey Dane allowed the speed to increase. He'd examined his map carefully at home and he knew what to expect. His car was highly powered and the engine was running smoothly. The road was a lonely one. Since the start of his journey, he'd encountered nothing but one cart and a couple of stray cattle. It was very unlikely that he'd meet any troublesome traffic before he reached Hamley, the market town six miles beyond the hill. The car was gathering speed.

Then, rounding a bend, he saw a motionless car in the middle of the road. Geoffrey slowed down sharply. He might have passed the obstructing car by driving with one wheel in the shallow roadside ditch, but he was a member of the Royal Automobile Club, which required him to help other drivers in need of assistance.

At the side of the road stood a woman, evidently the driver of the motionless car.

"Anything wrong?" Geoffrey asked.

"Everything," she said.

Geoffrey got out of his car. He noticed at once that the woman's face was covered with dirt, and that there was a good deal of mud on her frock. He recognised the signs of a long and useless struggle with an engine; but he was too polite to smile.

"Do you know anything about cars?" she asked.

To Geoffrey the question was almost insulting. He was a young man who particularly prided himself on his knowledge of mechanics. And the woman did not speak in the manner of a helpless maiden seeking assistance. But Geoffrey understood that no temper could be sunny after a struggle with an engine, so he just said, "I ought to know something about them. I'm driving one."

"It doesn't mean that you know anything about it," said the woman. "I was driving that one." She pointed to her car. "And I haven't the remotest idea what's wrong."

This time Geoffrey felt that the woman deserved a reprimand. He was prepared to help her, but he felt that he had a right to expect politeness in return.

"I don't think you should have stopped right in the middle of the road," he said.

"I didn't stop at all," said the woman. "The beastly thing just stopped there itself. To tell you the truth, if I could, I'd have pushed the car round so as to block the road altogether and force anyone who came along to stop and help me."

Geoffrey remained polite, which was very much to his credit.

"I see she's a Ford," he said, "and Fords are a bit hard to start sometimes, especially in cold weather. I'll have a try."

6.1. Geoffrey allowed himself to drive at high speed because he

- A. wanted to reach Hamley before it got jammed with traffic.
- B. had checked what the route was like before setting off.
- C. had to make up for the time lost on the way.
- D. was trying to ensure there was nothing wrong with the engine.

6.2. When Geoffrey pulled up,

- A. the woman's untidy appearance made him smile.
- B. he noticed that the woman had made an effort to repair the car herself.
- C. the woman's clumsiness with the car irritated him.
- D. he was relieved to find that the woman knew what the problem was.

6.3. What can you learn from the conversation between the two characters?

- A. The woman deliberately stopped the car in the middle of the road.
- B. Geoffrey was short-tempered and behaved in an arrogant way.
- C. Geoffrey's politeness proved unbearable to the woman.
- D. The woman had doubts about Geoffrey's ability to repair the car.

ROAD RAGE

US auto club AutoVantage recently conducted a survey to determine the reasons for anger and violence among drivers. The results show that road rage is caused mainly by such factors as speeding, changing lanes without indicating, talking on mobile phones while driving, beeping and using angry gestures.

From the survey we learn that the dubious honour of having the most aggressive drivers in the US belongs to Miami. This is probably due to the fact that Miami has a very diverse population, including a large community of senior citizens who have a very different driving style to younger drivers.

Survey respondents also provided suggestions on how to decrease the number of road-rage incidents. They ranged from a ban on talking on mobile phones to increasing police presence on the roads. Only 7 percent of the respondents felt that a public awareness campaign would be useful.

In the survey men reported feeling rage more frequently than women. Interestingly, I have read several articles lately which express concern about an apparent rise in road-rage incidents among women. However, these are based on anecdotal evidence and the authors' general impressions, not facts and figures, so it's unclear whether this alleged trend is genuine or not.

It's important to keep in mind that road rage is not an uncontrollable phenomenon. As drivers, we all have a responsibility to behave as safely as possible. We also have the choice over whether to seek revenge for a real or perceived insult, or to set a good example. So the next time you're driving and someone cuts in on you or makes rude gestures, don't engage in aggressive behaviour, but keep a cool head. It's better to let them have their way, even when it feels unfair. It's more important to think of driving as a group experience instead of a competition. Remember that the other driver is likely to be under just as much stress as you are – they are just worse at handling it.

6.4. Which of the following is stated in the text as an opinion, not a fact?

- A. Exceeding the speed limit is one of the reasons for road rage.
- B. Miami is the American city with the most aggressive drivers.
- C. Few people consider a public awareness campaign worthwhile.
- D. Women drivers have become more aggressive.

6.5. In the last paragraph, the writer gives advice on how to

- A. make people take responsibility for their aggressive driving.
- B. improve your driving skills in order to be safe on the road.
- C. react to the hostile behaviour of some road users.
- D. avoid a collision if someone cuts in on you.
