This is what the food looks like in the 'world's best restaurant'

It's not cheap, though.

THE TOP 10 restaurants in the world have been named.

The top spot went to Guy Savoy's restaurant in la Monnaie in Paris, with Japanese restaurants on top overall on La Liste, which claims to be more "more scientific and reliable" than its British-based rival, the 50 Best Restaurants.

However, a dinner at Savoy in Paris isn't cheap. A set menu for a table is €390 and average a la carte prices are €200 excluding drinks.

Two Tokyo institutions made the top 10: the minuscule Kyo Aji, and Kyubey, whose sushi is renowned for being both "extraordinary and reasonably priced", La Liste said.

{glazed Bresse chicken} One of the servers loved to tell me things like "and this is just the beginning," "and there's more" or "sorry it's not the end yet." I certainly didn't mind when he came back and asked if I wanted more mushrooms and chicken!

Two New York restaurants were up there alongside them, double Emmy-award-winning US television chef Eric Ripert's Le Bernardin fish restaurant — which came joint second — and Jean-Georges in Trump Tower.

Italy's Osteria Francescana in Modena — which topped the 50 Best rankings — came joint third in La Liste, which praised not only its inventive use of the local Parmigiano Reggiano cheese but also "its deep commitment to fighting food waste".

Restaurants in Italy also came out best overall for value for money, it said.

La Liste bills itself as a “guide of the guides”, pulling together reviews from almost 400 guidebooks, newspapers and online sites from TripAdvisor to the New York Times and the prestigious Michelin rankings.

An aggregator, its list of the 1,000 top-rated restaurants in the world is modelled on the world tennis rankings, the Shanghai Ranking for universities — and film reviews website Rotten Tomatoes.
